WATER:

There are two types of "water" in the body, inter-cellular and intra-cellular fluid. Inter-cellular fluid is the fluid outside an individual cell, while intra-cellular fluid is the fluid inside the cell. Both are necessary for the proper functioning of the cell, but most people do not recognize the absolutely crucial nature of drinking water that can achieve maximum intra-cellular hydration. To have biological activity, the cells must absorb the water.

Research in the field of cellular hydration has shown that when cells absorb water and swell up, the action triggers the anabolic healing mechanism. The anabolic state is accompanied by a positive nitrogen balance, protein synthesis and growth hormone release. Cellular hydration results in a balanced pH, increased fat burning, better resistance to viruses and reduced free radical damage. When cells become dehydrated, the action triggers the catabolic state, which can be seen as muscle wasting, inflammation and premature aging.

The modern scientific understanding of water clearly shows that all waters are not created equal when it comes to their ability to put water inside the cells. The cells of the body make up the tissues, which in turn extend their organization to the level of an organ (like the liver and kidney) and then to the systems of the body, such as the digestive system, the endocrine system and the central nervous system. The body simply does not function properly when the cells are dehydrated. Dehydrated cells can lead to cell hypoxia (oxygen starvation and no energy), cell catabolism (cell death), DNA damage (cancer), cell acidity (accumulated toxins that short circuit enzymatic pathways) and accelerated cell aging (improper function). Accumulate enough dehydrated cells and you have a systemic failure, such as a heart attack.

To your cells, water is everything. Over 99% of the biological reactions in the body involve water as the source of a hydrogen proton donor. Water is needed to deliver and metabolize nutrients. Water is required to eliminate toxic waste. The electrical resistance and capacitance of intra-cellular water greatly affects communication pathways throughout the body. Water is needed to support protein structure and enzyme activity. Water even serves as the adhesive that holds together the various structures in a cell's architecture. When these functions of water are compromised through de-hydration at the cellular level, disease and the aging process begin to manifest and accelerate.
